While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations.

Officials agree that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

"I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations.

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations.

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations.

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations.

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations.

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations.

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations."

While poverty may keep minority children from homes that would be "foster care" for non-minority children, the probability that they will have family support is not so much less. Officials don't deny that the county's child-welfare system takes Indian children from their families more often than non-Indian children. "I don't think there's a problem," she said. "I would say the county has a bigger problem than most other counties with significant Indian populations.