TODAY’S TIP: Be aware of your nouns, adjectives and verbs when covering civil unrest.

What does it mean to you to write about these things, you have to watch them, and you have to watch them repeatedly, and over and over again. And it’s hard because eventually you will see yourself. You’ll see your brother and you’ll see your friends.”

Violence and Black-led Resistance.

Do you need legal assistance? Contact the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press legal hotline at 1-800-336-4243 or hotline@rcfp.org to reach attorneys.

Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press

Thurston's violent death and the police shooting of Dijon Kizzee in Los Angeles have raised concerns about how decisions are made around protest coverage.

Here are some of the community engagement efforts around public media.

We’re Engaged!

If you were a journalist covering a public protest?

Be aware of your nouns, adjectives and verbs when covering civil unrest.

Our friends at Trusting News, a Southern movement journalism collective, which compiled "Focusing on Property Destruction when the Protests are Responding to the Deaths of Black Lives," is a great starting point. It asks readers to consider: Do you cover the property damage or the systemic crimes? Do you write about economic injustices with the same tenacity as you do the crime? Do you consider the economic impact on other groups? Do you consider the lack of resources, the lack of basic human needs in the immediate area? Do you cover this or do you cover the story? Trusting News is still relevant. Some things to remember: keep the conversation.

RTDNA

TODAY’S TIP: Be aware of your nouns, adjectives and verbs when covering civil unrest.

Do you need legal assistance? Contact the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press legal hotline at 1-800-336-4243 or hotline@rcfp.org to reach attorneys.

Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press

Thurston’s violent death and the police shooting of Dijon Kizzee in Los Angeles have raised concerns about how decisions are made around protest coverage.

Here are some of the community engagement efforts around public media.

We’re Engaged!

If you were a journalist covering a public protest?

Be aware of your nouns, adjectives and verbs when covering civil unrest.

Our friends at Trusting News, a Southern movement journalism collective, which compiled “Focusing on Property Destruction when the Protests are Responding to the Deaths of Black Lives,” is a great starting point. It asks readers to consider: Do you cover the property damage or the systemic crimes? Do you write about economic injustices with the same tenacity as you do the crime? Do you consider the economic impact on other groups? Do you cover this or do you cover the story? Trusting News is still relevant. Some things to remember: keep the conversation.

RTDNA

TODAY’S TIP: Be aware of your nouns, adjectives and verbs when covering civil unrest.

Do you need legal assistance? Contact the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press legal hotline at 1-800-336-4243 or hotline@rcfp.org to reach attorneys.

Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press

Thurston’s violent death and the police shooting of Dijon Kizzee in Los Angeles have raised concerns about how decisions are made around protest coverage.

Here are some of the community engagement efforts around public media.

We’re Engaged!

If you were a journalist covering a public protest?

Be aware of your nouns, adjectives and verbs when covering civil unrest.

Our friends at Trusting News, a Southern movement journalism collective, which compiled “Focusing on Property Destruction when the Protests are Responding to the Deaths of Black Lives,” is a great starting point. It asks readers to consider: Do you cover the property damage or the systemic crimes? Do you write about economic injustices with the same tenacity as you do the crime? Do you consider the economic impact on other groups? Do you cover this or do you cover the story? Trusting News is still relevant. Some things to remember: keep the conversation.

RTDNA

TODAY’S TIP: Be aware of your nouns, adjectives and verbs when covering civil unrest.

Do you need legal assistance? Contact the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press legal hotline at 1-800-336-4243 or hotline@rcfp.org to reach attorneys.

Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press

Thurston’s violent death and the police shooting of Dijon Kizzee in Los Angeles have raised concerns about how decisions are made around protest coverage.

Here are some of the community engagement efforts around public media.

We’re Engaged!

If you were a journalist covering a public protest?

Be aware of your nouns, adjectives and verbs when covering civil unrest.

Our friends at Trusting News, a Southern movement journalism collective, which compiled “Focusing on Property Destruction when the Protests are Responding to the Deaths of Black Lives,” is a great starting point. It asks readers to consider: Do you cover the property damage or the systemic crimes? Do you write about economic injustices with the same tenacity as you do the crime? Do you consider the economic impact on other groups? Do you cover this or do you cover the story? Trusting News is still relevant. Some things to remember: keep the conversation.

RTDNA

TODAY’S TIP: Be aware of your nouns, adjectives and verbs when covering civil unrest.

Do you need legal assistance? Contact the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press legal hotline at 1-800-336-4243 or hotline@rcfp.org to reach attorneys.

Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press