Today’s Tip:

Amanda Zamora
Commissioner, The 19th
Here and Now

The 19th has recently announced six spots in its Local Reporting Network that will be devoted to public media journalism on how systemic racism affects communities. This essay, True Remove, by commissioner Amanda Zamora, captures the state of the conversation.

Seeking local public broadcasting orgs

ProPublica recently announced six spots in its Local Reporting Network that will be devoted to public media journalism on how systemic racism affects communities. This essay, True Remove, by commissioner Amanda Zamora, captures the state of the conversation.

Did you stumble upon this newsletter and find it awesome? Please just say “yes” or “no” (or anything else!)

We’re Engaged!

Amanda Zamora's essay, titled “True Remove,” is featured in this issue of America Amplified. Today, we have a dispatch from Megan Feeney, an America Amplified freelancer for NET in Nebraska. This piece reflects on her experience reporting on systemic racism in newsrooms during the past few weeks.

Some of the findings are available in a new poll out on race and police reform. Our partner, the Public Agenda/USA Today/Ipsos poll, has an opportunity to grow its audience (if it could create stronger signal strength -- lots of folks say they can't pick it up!) and shore up its image, by organizing an event that promotes the issues it's covering.

Read the full essay here.

Systemic injustice requires systematic dismantling.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

We’re Engaged!

Amanda Zamora's essay, titled “True Remove,” is featured in this issue of America Amplified. Today, we have a dispatch from Megan Feeney, an America Amplified freelancer for NET in Nebraska. This piece reflects on her experience reporting on systemic racism in newsrooms during the past few weeks.

Some of the findings are available in a new poll out on race and police reform. Our partner, the Public Agenda/USA Today/Ipsos poll, has an opportunity to grow its audience (if it could create stronger signal strength -- lots of folks say they can't pick it up!) and shore up its image, by organizing an event that promotes the issues it's covering.

Read the full essay here.

Systemic injustice requires systematic dismantling.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic racism during the past few weeks, "we're in, with suggestions on how to do better." She writes:

we wield within our own newsrooms is as dangerous as it is hypocritical.

I've come to realize that no matter how much "good" we think we do through our journalism — roles in systemic raci