Wyoming Public Radio’s Kamila Kudelska goes back in history and takes a look at segregation in school, something you might think was just in the south. But it turns out Wyoming had its own form of segregation, as described in an episode of Wyoming Public Media’s “The Modern West” podcast.

“The Spanish School:” Mexican Segregation In Northwest Wyoming

The episode is part of a larger series exploring the treatment of people of Mexican heritage in the U.S. The Modern West is a podcast of Wyoming Public Media, and the series is called “The Spanish School” and looks at the history of segregation in Mexican communities in the West.

Usually segregation in school is something you heard about in the south. But it turns out Wyoming had its own form of segregation. The episode of “The Modern West” podcast tells the story of a school in Jackson, Wyoming, that was segregated based on ethnicity.

Wyoming’s segregation was based on ethnicity, not race, and it was called a “Spanish School.” The episode of “The Modern West” podcast tells the story of a school in Jackson, Wyoming, that was segregated based on ethnicity.

The episode explains how Wyoming’s segregation was different from the segregation based on race in the south. In the south, segregation was based on legal and social norms, while in Wyoming, it was based on economic and cultural factors.

The podcast explores how segregation in Wyoming affected Mexican Americans and their descendants. It also looks at how segregation in Wyoming compares to segregation in other parts of the country.

The episode of “The Modern West” podcast is available on the Wyoming Public Media website and through your favorite podcast platform. It’s a great resource for anyone interested in learning more about the history of segregation in the West.

Looking for more information on this topic? Check out the Wyoming Public Media website for more episodes of “The Modern West” podcast and other resources on the history of the West.

Wyoming Public Media’s Kamila Kudelska goes back in history and takes a look at segregation in school, something you might think was just in the south. But it turns out Wyoming had its own form of segregation, as described in an episode of Wyoming Public Media’s “The Modern West” podcast.