According to Calhoun, 61 percent of “we the people” are in favor of having it, but inside the Supreme Court, opinions have evolved over time in surprising ways. And outside the court, the debate drove one woman in the U.K. to take on the U.K.’s death penalty system from Europe. It also caused states to resuscitate old methods used for executing prisoners on death row. And according to Calhoun, 61 percent of “we the people” are in favor of having it.

Perhaps more than anything, it forced a conversation on what constitutes cruel and unusual punishment. The death penalty. The U.S. Constitution: “Cruel and unusual” America has long wrestled with this concept in the context of our strongest punishment. This week, we explore these little words embedded in the 8th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution.
